

The decision-making in medicine is often non-binary and regularly involve teams of different doctors or indeed members of the multi-disciplinary team. There are times when decisions made result in poor or unexpected outcomes and this is compounded by the systemic pressure that doctors work in today.

It would be an extremely inefficient environment if doctors made or refrained from making decisions to avoid criminal sanctions, one where patient care was side-lined rather than centralised.