

This fills me with complete dread and I really think if it is implemented- will be the final nail in the coffin for the medical profession.

We need to be much more open about mistakes which will always occur and need to be investigated and lessons learned as a result -a real understanding that they are multi factorial and not normally down to a single individual or process but by sanctioning individual duty of candour - you are simply creating scapegoats and intentionally intimidating the medical profession in an already heightened medico-defence environment.

I suspect if this is introduced there will be mass resignations and I really fear for our future.

We need to learn from the examples set by the aerospace industry open and transparent.
